Historical trauma and health: Integrating social and biological pathways

In this talk Dr. Thayer uses data from Aotearoa New Zealand and the United States to discuss the potential role of historical trauma in shaping the social gradient in health. She encourages anthropologists and public health professionals to consider how a historical trauma framework may be integrated into their own research.

Zaneta M. Thayer is an Associate Professor of Anthropology at Dartmouth College. Her research is focused on understanding both how and why early life environments shape patterns of human biology and health. Her goal is to produce scholarship of interest to evolutionary anthropologists, public health practitioners, and the populations she works with.
