Examining the Tibetan Buddhist ontology of death and dying, this dissertation investigate the question: what is an "ideal death" in Tibetan Buddhist culture, and what are cultural practices developed to achieve this ideal. Through this aim, this study inquires into the foundational paradigm of reincarnation as a structuring lens for end-of-life care and the intersection of Tibetan medical and Buddhist practice in facilitating an ideal death as a collaborative event.