DOING FIELDWORK IN REVOLUTIONARY TIMES

Part of the Emory Forum for the Ethnographic Study of Religion 2019

THUR | OCT 10 | 12:30-2:00 PM | ATWOOD 360

In stories from the field, adapting to unexpected conditions is nearly a rite of passage for anthropologists. But what does this celebrated trope of ethnographic authority mean when a country undergoes radical political transformation and against all conventional wisdom? Drawing on materials from Egypt that precede the 2011 revolution and follow the 2013 coup, this talk reflects on the limits and strategies of writing ethnography for the political present.

Angie Heo is Assistant Professor in the Divinity School at the University of Chicago. After receiving her Ph.D. in Anthropology from the University of California at Berkeley, she taught at Barnard College and held research fellow positions at Emory University and the Max Planck Institute for the Study of Religious and Ethnic Diversity. Based on fieldwork in Egypt, The Political Lives of Saints (University of California Press 2018) is her first book.

Sponsored by the Department of Religion, Fox Center for Humanistic Inquiry, Department of Middle Eastern and South Asian Studies, and Department of Anthropology of Emory University