

THE PROGRAM IN LINGUISTICS PRESENTS

SHARESE KING

University of Chicago
Department of Linguistics

Tuesday

March 3rd @ 4:15pm

Atwood, Room 360

On Race and Place: Investigating stylistic variation in Rochester, New York

Recent explorations of regional variation across African American speech communities have brought to the forefront the linguistic heterogeneity across African American Language (AAL). Having problematized the presentation of AAL as a uniform variety (Wolfram 2007; 2015), intra-group analyses highlight the diverse social and linguistic constructions among African American speakers. In this talk, I zoom in on three personae local to the African American community in Rochester, New York, contextualizing each style against the backdrop of a post-industrial city in the Rustbelt region. I investigate how the three personae, The Mobile Professional, The Hood Kid, and The Biker recruit or reject vocalic patterns of the Northern Cities Shift to construct identities relevant to their social landscape. The findings challenge how we define the dialect, while also complicating our understanding of the relationship between race and language.

This lecture is cosponsored by the Center for Mind, Brain & Culture, and the Department of Anthropology.

Program in Linguistics | Modern Languages, Suite 202C | ling@emory.edu